WHEREAS, on April 28, 1971, the Occupational Health and Safety Act took effect, creating the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) as well as the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, an independent research institute in the then-Department of Health, Education and Welfare and now under the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; and

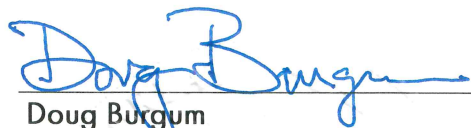

WHEREAS, OSHA works to ensure safe and healthful working conditions for workers by setting and enforcing standards and requirements for workplace safety and health, as well as providing training, education, outreach and assistance to employers and employees; and

WHEREAS, April 28 is observed annually as Worker's Memorial Day as a day to remember people who passed away on the job or were injured while working; and
